President Wilson was the picture of health when he arrived in Paris just before Christmas, 1918, for the peace conference. His cheeks were full and firm and his skin had a ruddy glow. Paris went into raptures over his smile. His eyes were clear and bright, testifying to almost perfect physical condition. This photograph was taken in Paris late in December, 1918.

At the peace conference Wilson saw more people and worked harder and longer than any other statesman. Months of such unbroken labor pulled him down very noticeably. Upon his return last summer the treaty fight opened in Washington, with its additional strain, and last fall, through far from well, he went on the western speaking tour which ended abruptly photograph was taken in Kansas City in September, 1919.

Now President Wilson is recovering slowly, but it requires only a comparison of these photographs to show that he has suffered intensely and is still a long way from "fit." His face is pinched and thin; old lines have deepened; new lines have appeared; his expression is strained. This photograph was taken in Washington, in March, 1920.

mayor and the new chief were present, J. W. Wise, of this city, was appointed as night policeman. After a heated discussion of Sunday closing a decision was not reached as to whether or not the stores of the city would be permitted to remain open. This matter will be decided upon at a special meeting very soon.
